

Distributed Leadership: An Overview of the Evidence

Alma Harris

Abstract

This paper explores the relationship between distributed leadership and organizational change. It draws upon the existing literature to consider whether distributed forms of leadership influence development and change in schools. The paper examines the research base relating to distributed leadership and organizational outcomes. It focuses on how different patterns or configurations of distributed leadership contribute to organizational development. The paper concludes by highlighting issues that require further study and more empirical confirmation.