Paul Stapleton says his composting experiment may not be practical for most in Hong Kong, but that doesn’t mean we can’t consider it.

For the past four years, I have been conducting one little experiment in Hong Kong. I have kept a composting system (a small black plastic box) in the garbage area of my five-room apartment. The system is made by the company that makes food composting systems in the United States. I have been feeding it with kitchen scraps from my family of four people. The system is a composter, which is a type of composting system commonly used for home composting. It is designed to break down organic waste into nutrient-rich compost, which can be used as a soil amendment in gardens and in the kitchen.

The composter is a small, black plastic box that is placed on a wooden base. It has a top and bottom cover, and a door that can be opened to add or retrieve compost. The composting system is designed to break down organic waste into nutrient-rich compost, which can be used as a soil amendment in gardens and in the kitchen.
