II. Welcome Message

Established in July 2015, The Academy of Hong Kong Studies (AHKS) is intended to be the leading academic platform for the promotion of Hong Kong Studies. It is a research centre, an academy for developing courses and training programmes on Hong Kong Studies, and a platform that offers an interface between researchers specializing in Hong Kong Studies and the broader communities in Hong Kong and other parts of the world. The Hong Kong Studies Annual Conference (HKSAC) is part of the AHKS's strategic initiatives aiming at fulfilling our mission to drive interdisciplinary knowledge creation and transfer initiatives in the areas of Hong Kong Studies.

The HKSAC provides an annual occasion for bringing together the Hong Kong Studies research community and promoting exchange, sharing and collaboration of Hong Kong-focused research. We will make use of this annual occasion for honouring outstanding papers in different disciplines of Hong Kong Studies and a Review Panel comprising of distinguished scholars has been formed to identify and recommend outstanding papers. Apart from honouring outstanding papers, we will also hold book-talks and dialogues, and provide a platform for PhD students from around the world to present their Hong Kong Studies papers. We hope that the HKSAC could help fosters the development of a cross-regional Hong Kong Studies research community.

Together we will take Hong Kong Studies to new heights.

VI. Abstracts of Outstanding Papers

(1) More than Just Entertaining: Cinematic Containment and Asia's Cold War in Hong Kong, 1949-1959

Modern Chinese Literature and Culture, vol. 30, no.2

Prof FU Poshek

University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign

This essay aims to bring attention to the dynamic role of popular culture in Asia's Cold War by exploring the covert political mobilization and propaganda warfare of Hong Kong Mandarin cinema from around 1946 to 1960, a period characterized by the struggles between China, Nationalist Taiwan, and the United States to win the hearts and minds of Chinese in the region.

Drawing on untapped sources, it discusses what can be called "cinematic containment," the efforts of US and Taiwan propaganda agents and Hong Kong "Free China" studios to produce films that were more than just entertaining to try to draw audiences away from Communist influence. This brings to light how the global Cold War interacted with local forces in shaping and refashioning the politics of cultural production in Hong Kong and the human responses involved in it.

(2) Echoslamming: how incivility interacts with cyberbalkanization on the social media in Hong Kong

Asian Journal of Communication Volume 29, 2019 - Issue 4

Dr CHAN Chung-hong

University of Mannheim

Dr CHOW Siu-lun

The Education University of Hong Kong

Dr FU King-wa

The Hong Kong Polytechnic University

Cyberbalkanization has growingly become common on the Internet and can lead to public's opinion polarization. This study investigates a specific process of cyberbalkanization through which incivility is circulated within online communities. From a dataset of Hong Kong-based Facebook Pages collected during a social movement, a set of politically-organized communities was identified and their connectivity generated a post-sharing network. A random sample of contents shared between and within these communities was then manually classified based on the level of incivility. The targets of offence through the use of uncivil language were also coded. Contents shared within ideologically compatible communities were found to be more likely to be uncivil. The association was significantly more positive in a populist community, of which members had unique political nature and cultural norms. The targets were usually political opponents and incivility was adopted to petition detractors from within-community discussions. We therefore suggest 'echoslamming' is an online phenomenon through which uncivil contents catalyse anger toward political opponents among ideologically congruent information sources and consequently reinforce the audience's predilection. Such a mechanism can be one underlying explanation for a vicious circle of cyberbalkanization-induced polarization on political opinions.

(3) Gerrymandering in Electoral Autocracies: Evidence from Hong Kong

British Journal of Political Science Volume 49, Issue 2 (April 2019)

Dr WONG Hok-wui, Stan

The Hong Kong Polytechnic University

To authoritarian rulers, holding somewhat competitive elections enhances legitimacy, but entails political risks. Committing electoral fraud can secure victory, but may jeopardize regime legitimacy. However, there is a tool of electoral manipulation that allows authoritarian rulers to reduce electoral risk while preserving legitimacy: gerrymandering. This article undertakes a systematic study of gerrymandering in Hong Kong, using a dataset that documents boundary changes at the level of residential buildings. The empirical findings show a significant partisan bias in electoral redistricting: opposition constituencies are more likely to be redistricted. Redistricting, however, fails to deter opposition incumbents from seeking re-election. No significant negative relationship is found between redistricting and opposition incumbents' vote share, although redistricting does reduce their overall chances of re-election. The results suggest that gerrymandering, which involves the use of packing and cracking strategies in different districts, can be employed to undermine the aggregate electoral performance of the opposition parties.

(4) Bourgeois Hong Kong and its South Seas connections: a cultural logic of overseas Chinese nationalism, 1898-1933

Nations and Nationalism Volume 25, Issue 1 (January 2019)

Dr KUO Huei-Ying

Johns Hopkins University

This paper elaborates upon a cultural logic of overseas Chinese nationalism. Around the early twentieth century, some bourgeois members of overseas Chinese in Hong Kong, Taiwan, and South Seas mobilised Confucianism as an ethno-symbol. The latter helped the overseas Chinese bourgeoisie to counter the quest for greater secularisation and to confront the surge of anti-imperialist movements. The implications of this research include to recentre the role of overseas Chinese in China's modern transformation; to decentre the May Fourth agendas in the understanding of overseas Chinese nationalism; and to situate overseas Chinese nationalism in an extraterritorial space, which includes the Confucian zone created in the dialogical connections between Confucian intellectual elites (such as Zheng Xiaoxu and Chen Huanzhang) and overseas Chinese bourgeois networks that converged in Hong Kong and spread transnationally.

(5) Looking for big 'fry': The motives and methods of middle-class international property investors

SAGE Journals Volume: 55 issue: 9 (July 2018)

Dr HO Hang-kei

University of Helsinki

Prof Rowland ATKINSON

The University of Sheffield

Anxieties about the effects of international property investment in world cities like London have mainly focused on super-rich investors and corporate vehicles that have generated price inflation of assets and accelerated exclusion from an already expensive market. In fact, many international investors in the city's housing market are middle-class individuals, and focusing on Hong Kong as an emblematic example of such processes, we examine their motives and the products offered to them by important investment intermediaries. We find that an important rationale for these investments lies in local class-based uncertainties and existential anxieties concerning the future of Hong Kong itself. We focus on the cultural roots of these investor rationalities but also consider the role of investment intermediaries who have helped bolster confidence while shielding investors from the consequences of their aggregated market power – concerns in London over household displacement from foreign investment. We suggest that what may seem to be the predatory search to 'fry' property (炒樓), a Hongkonger colloquialism referring to the search for high performing investments, should also be understood as actions anchored in and generated by the habitus of the Hong Kong middle class whose lives have been moulded by historical geopolitical uncertainty and worries about its longer-term social positioning and security.

(6) Home and the materialization of the divergent subjectivities of older women in Hong Kong

Journal of Gender Studies Volume 28, 2019 - Issue 2 (January 2018)

Dr CHOI Wing Yee, Kimburley

City University of Hong Kong

Although the social status of women in Hong Kong has changed significantly in recent decades, Hong Kong women continue to perform mothering, caregiving and homemaking tasks into late adulthood. Employing an agential realist approach to analyse the homes and discursive-materialist practices of three older women, this paper explores how the entanglement of materialities, discourses and subjectivities at home as a site of cultural action contributes to the ongoing enactment of divergent subjectivities of older Hong Kong women. The structural-spatial configurations of the three homes manifest the patrilineal and male-dominated family system in Hong Kong, and such older women perform a set of 'normal' (house) wifely and motherly duties linked to the maintenance of the male-dominated family system. Nevertheless, these older women's subjectivities and their domestic worlds evolve through ongoing discursive-materialist practices. This paper further argues that, even if such factors as materialities, structures and practices either are neutral or indeed reinforce existing power imbalances, the dynamic and ongoing intra-action of these factors results in exclusionary but open conditions that may stabilize or subvert social phenomena, such as the ones discussed in this study: patriarchal domestic practices in Hong Kong homes.

(7) The paradox of academic determinism and adolescent romance in Hong Kong

Journal of Youth Studies Volume 22, 2019 - Issue 5

Dr CHAN Hau-nung, Annie

Lingnan University

How do adolescents negotiate romance in an environment that is hostile to it? Why do they seek out and practice romantic engagements despite negative sanctions? This paper addresses these questions by examining how Hong Kong Chinese adolescents narrate and practice romance in the context of academic determinism – the discourse that academic success is the most important determinant of young people’s futures. I discuss how academic determinism shapes their narratives, ideals and practices of romance. I also analyse the paradox of academic determinism – how it simultaneously de-legitimises adolescent romance and fuels young people’s desire for it. By focusing on transactions between young people and their environments, this paper makes a unique contribution towards theorising how young people negotiate and practice romance in the context of academic pressure, adult surveillance and control.

Guanfu Salt Farm and Hong Kong in the Song Dynasty

KUNG Sau-sau Cecile

The University of Hong Kong

The large number of artefacts unearthed at the construction site of the To Kwa Wan Station (now renamed Sung Wong Toi Station) of the MTR Shatin-Central Link in 2012-2013 had aroused enormous public attention in Hong Kong. However, there has been an absence of a systematic compilation of the historical data of Hong Kong during the Song Dynasty, which are limited in quantity and scattered across various sources. As a starting point, this paper attempts to collect and compile the historical data of the Guanfu Salt Farm, officially built by the Song administration within modern Hong Kong territories, in order to reconstruct its history for the reflection of the Hong Kong society of the time.

Hong Kong as a property jurisdiction

YIP Kwan-Chung Maurice

University of Lausanne

Phrases such as property state, real estate hegemony, land-dependent economy and land (re)development regime are invoked to characterise Hong Kong's urban governance. While such vocabulary helps explore land injustice in Hong Kong and recognises the society has been heavily relying on land and property activities, few attempts notice the uniqueness of Hong Kong's sequential constitutional orders and its relations to those activities. This paper aims to explore how urban governance is impacted by the formulation and implementation of the new constitutional order of 'One Country, Two Systems' that distinguishes between the British colonial government and the current government under Chinese sovereignty. Drawing on the works of legal geography and urban studies, this paper names Hong Kong as 'property jurisdiction', which concurrently refers to both the territory and the exercise of powers, to capture the scalar politics between Hong Kong and China. A geographical enquiry is employed to illustrate the spatiality of the constitutional order and its implications on land injustice. This paper traces how the model of 'One Country, Two Systems' was formulated, paying a particular focus on how those formulators viewed land and property in Hong Kong, by analysing the declassified archival materials and the published materials. Though common law and leasehold land system were perpetuated from the colonial period, the new constitutional order changed its practices and the underlying logic and ideology, as exemplified by the cross-boundary infrastructure and several controversies of urban phenomena after the sovereignty transfer. This paper, then, explains how the legal ordering and spatial ordering are mutually constitutive in the urban governance of this property jurisdiction for prosperity and stability, yet land injustice resulted.

Situating the local: interpreting Hong Kong culture in globalization era

ZHANG Zexun

Queen's University, Belfast

After the post-colonial period, there is a trend that cities have ambitions to become global cities through the interurban competition. The current global phenomenon—the emergence of ‘global cities of the arts’ or the now global aspiration among cities to become a ‘Capital of culture’—is evidenced in governments huge investments in the arts and culture sector. A culture-led urban regeneration strategy has been widely adopted by cities like Singapore, Shanghai or Hong Kong. However, the interpreting and representing of the local, especially the vibrant multicultural communities of Hong Kong, are in a marginalized status by a public discourse that favors responding to international standards. An increasing body of work calls for greater recognition of the “situated cultural practices [and] internal logics, histories and structures” of particular places in the study of cultural policy (Gilmore, 2013, p. 86; see also Durrer, 2017). Therefore, it is importance of revaluating and cultivating local cultures when formulating culture capitals under the influences of globalization and neo-liberalism. This paper takes West Kowloon Cultural District which is a culture-led regeneration project as a case study. By applying an interpretative approach for exploring its two major facilities, Xiqu Center and M+ Museum, the study will suggest that policy makers should value Hong Kong’s local cultural identity based on an Asian context as opposed to making profit by establishing a global representation of its creative economy.

The Mass Transit Rail: Transcending infrastructure

ISMANGIL Milan

The Chinese University of Hong Kong

The Mass transit Rail or MTR is a vital part of Hong Kong’s infrastructure. Studies relating to the MTR focus generally on its economical or mobility aspects, highlighting housing prizes and its effect on urban planning. In this paper however I will take the MTR as a site that transcends infrastructure. I propose to study three MTR stations, namely Kennedy Town, Tsim Tsa Tsui, and Sha Tin. These three stations have been chosen for their diversity, the first being a local site with a new MTR station undergoing processes of gentrification. The second a major transfer point and one of Hong Kong’s major MTR stations, being host to numerous daily happenings and the last Sha Tin, which in itself can be designated as a tourist destination as many mainland tourists make it their destination in the weekend. Interplaying the similarities and differences between these stations we can articulate what the MTR means in different situations, as more than just infrastructure.

As a vital part of Hong Kong the MTR, similarly to the function of rivers in (ancient) cities, has transformed itself into the lifeblood of the city. It is a site of commerce, memory, confrontation, protests and more. This study aims to develop an ethnography of the MTR, showing through case studies of select MTR stations how the MTR corporation promotes both locality as well as universality in Hong Kong through the makeup and design of their stations. It will further take note of the different ways MTR stations and their vicinity are utilized. For example As places of high mobility they are the lifeblood of many small local salespersons and are the place in which many online deals are finalized.

Nationalism and Patriotism on Social Media in Mainland China: A Case Study on Reports Related to Social Movements in Hong Kong

YUAN Chenxu

Tokyo University of Foreign Studies

The rule of law is a socio-legal concept that has remained as a core value in Hong Kong society for nearly 150 years since it was a British colony. However, the concept of rule of law has faced many challenges over the past two decades. The Basic Law of Hong Kong has been considered as a "mini-constitution" in Hong Kong, and representing the coexistence of common law and Chinese law under the framework of the constitution of PRC. One of the major aims of the Basic Law is to protect the Rule of Law in Hong Kong.

Nevertheless, frictional contact of Hong Kong law and Chinese law in the Basic Law has caused structural strains and triggered fierce debate in Hong Kong society. More specifically, frictional contact gives rise to a series constitutional conflicts in Hong Kong, which are evident in issues such as interpretation of basic law, implementation of national security bill, and application of national law. Such problems and conflicts have arisen from the significantly discrepant understanding on the concept and procedures of the "legal system" in Britain and in China.

The purpose of this paper is to explore the key challenges to the rule of law in Hong Kong. In particular, this paper analyzes and centers in the constitutional conflict after the Umbrella Movement. What are the challenges of the rule of law in Hong Kong? Is there a tendency that these social movements over assert right, freedoms and democracy with less respect to the rule of law and independence of the judiciary? Or is it politicizing court proceedings? These are the major questions to be explored in this paper.

The Hong Kong Jockey Club: An Elite Organisation?

LAI Pui Chi

University of Macau

There is this old joke that the Hong Kong Jockey Club was the ruling power in colonial Hong Kong, followed by the business Firm Jardine & Matheson Co., the Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation and the governor. Taking the Hong Kong Jockey Club as a case study, this paper proposes that such a major organisation can indeed have great influential power on the political, economic and social and cultural developments in a society. While addressing the development and role of the elite in Hong Kong, which was initially the British elite in the colonial period, but changed into the Chinese elite after the handover of Hong Kong in 1997, the main focus is the influence the Hong Kong Jockey Club has (had) on the elite groups. This analysis is partly done within the paradoxical context of contemporary Hong Kong, as on the one hand the territory has to deal with a regime change since the handover, respectively from the British colonial government to the government of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region, and on the other hand has to operate in an unchanged political and economic status based on the implementation of the One Country Two Systems principle and the Basic Law. This study seeks an understanding of the political development in Hong Kong, with a specific focus on the development of the ruling elite in colonial and post-colonial Hong Kong.

Cantonese Elements and the Transitions of Its Adoption in the Translated Detective Fictions Serialized in the Hong Kong Periodical Chinese and Foreign Stories

YUAN Zhen

City University of Hong Kong

During the first decade of the twentieth century, many revolutionary presses have started the renovation in language (Xia, 2005: 9-10). Most of the researchers studying the language movement of modern China are just concerned with the newspapers or journals operated in Shanghai, yet few of scholars in Chinese translated literature history attach enough importance to it and pay sufficient attention to Hong Kong, the previous British colony, for its contribution and value to the linguistic transference from the classical Chinese to the vernacular one (Li, 2019: 320).

This study intends to probe into the revolutionary literary journal 中外小說林 (Chinese and Foreign Stories, 1906-1908) and will explore the Chinese translated detective fictions published therein and will focus on the Cantonese elements contained by adopting the archival and archaeological method coupled with closing reading and textual analysis. It will elaborate on the changes of Cantonese use appeared during the running period of this journal and the relationship between these changes and the general language movement, with elements in Cantonese transliteration, vocabulary and syntax included.

The chief questions this research aims to answer include the following. (1) What source countries do the translated novels belong to and why did the editors or translators select the literary works in these countries to translate and publish? (2) How did the language use of Cantonese change in the translated detective fictions serialized in different issues of the journal? And how did the diction and syntax use of Cantonese and non-dialect, like the standard Chinese, present in the same issue? (3) What is its function or contribution to the Chinese language renovation occurred during the given historical period?

This research finds that the twists and turns in characters' language use can be largely attributed to the translators' strategies of selecting diction to tally with the source text. Their choice of words and syntax is restrained by the poetic context their translation is positioned in. The hybridity in the usage of Cantonese and standard Chinese spoken language forms a part of the overall characteristics of the revolutionary language especially for dialogues in the translated detective fictions published. And the fact of the inconsistent adoption of Cantonese in different issues or even sometimes in the same issue interplays with the unsystematic development of the vernacular language in the early twentieth century at Hong Kong.

"Rule of law" as a prominent battlefield of constitutional struggle in Hong Kong

From Sound to Screen: Film Adaptations of Radio Dramas in 1950s Hong Kong

CHEN Shu

Hong Kong University of Science and Technology

In the 1950s and early 1960s Hong Kong, radio permeated in the everyday life as a major mean for entertainment and information. The ubiquity of the technologically sound was not only exemplified by the popularity of the programs and the vast number of audience but also the radio inspired adaptations that sprawled across various genres and mediums. Cantonese writers and filmmakers were eager to have the electrified voice partake fully and creatively in popular cultures, engaging in particular with the film and music industry. It subsequently gave rise to a new genre in Cantonese cinema – radio drama film that flourished in Hong Kong and Southeast Asia in the 1950s and 1960s. According to the records of Hong Kong Film Archive, from 1949 to 1968 there were 93 film adaptations based on original radio novel and drama. Besides drawing the historical contours of the radio-film network, this paper will scrutinize an exemplary radio drama turned film A Mother's Tears (慈母淚, 1953)'s transmedial/transnational adaptation trajectory to shed light on the intermedia aesthetic criticisms. I describe how the film technology reconstitute the oral and spoken in a visual space, in particular the visual embodiment and representation of the storyteller's voice. Furthermore, this paper explores the female voice and agency's reenactment in the travelling narrative. I situate the voice on the "sensory-reflexive horizon" – an analytic framework proposed by film critic Miriam Hansen to understand how the experience of postwar colonial modernity is reflected and mediated in the vernacular film culture. I argue that it is precisely through the mediation of modern media, a distinct gender and local experience could be imagined, articulated and received.
